For my practical activity in Module 2, I created a simple e-commerce product page for the POCO X6 Pro 5G smartphone. I chose this theme because the phone is known for being a budget-friendly "flagship killer," which makes it an interesting product to showcase. Another reason why I chose this phone is because it's the phone that I'm currently using. My goal was to design a clean and organized webpage using only HTML while applying proper semantic structure.

At the top of the page, I used the <header> element to display the title of the site and a navigation bar with links to different sections of the page such as Features, Pricing, and Contact. This helps users easily move to the information they want. Inside the <main> tag, I divided the content into sections. The first section contains an <article> with a short description of the phone and an image of the product. I did this to introduce the device right away and catch the user's attention.

For the next section, I created an unordered list (<ul>) under the Features heading to highlight the main selling points of the phone like the 120Hz AMOLED display, fast charging, and powerful chipset. I chose a list because it organizes information clearly and makes it easy to read. After that, I included a <table> under the Pricing section to compare the two phone variants. Tables are useful for showing prices and specifications in a neat format.

Finally, I added a Contact section with a hyperlink to the official POCO website. The page ends with a <footer> that contains a simple copyright note. Overall, I used at least five semantic tags to give structure and meaning to my content. This activity helped me understand how to create a functional webpage layout using semantic HTML.
